China Mills's book Decolonizing Global Mental Health challenges this view. It locates Global Mental Health firmly within contemporary and historic global political and economic contexts. It does so in a variety of ways, for example by comparing the assumptions that underpin the movement with those of British Colonialism, particularly in India.

Mullan emphasizes that decolonizing mental health is more than just doing research on cultural competence — the ability to understand and interact with people of different cultures. Instead, it's recognizing that for many Black, Indigenous and Brown individuals, the trauma from oppression and colonization plays a major role in their state of mental health.

Decolonizing Global Mental Health through Jamaican Psychiatry. Jamaican psychiatry has made considerable contributions to the decolonization of Global Mental Health in the Caribbean. The primary mental health care program of Jamaica has critiqued and taken leaps toward decolonizing Global Mental Health (GMH) care in the service of attempting to address the impact that centuries of European racism and colonialism have had on the descendants of enslaved African peoples.

New Book: Decolonizing Global Mental Health by China Mills. Posted: 13 February, 2014. China Mills, a research assistant at the Oxford Poverty and Human Development Initiative (OPHI) at ODID, has published a book entitled "Decolonizing Global Mental Health" with Routledge. The book argues that it is imperative to explore what counts as evidence within Global Mental Health, and seeks to de-familiarize current 'Western' conceptions of psychology and psychiatry using postcolonial theory.

Fifty years of postcolonial deinstitutionalization of mental health services has led to the extensive integration of psychiatry with all categories of medicine and public health at a private and public level, and the abolition of medium- and long-term custodialization of persons with mental illness. In 1965 there were four psychiatrists, four mental health officers, one psychologist and two psychiatric social workers serving the population of 1.7 million people.
